

It would be nice if Amarak were to get rid of all the fat and simplified its interface.

Why bloat the program with Wikipedia?

If I want to know something about a particular artist, I go to Wikipedia using Firefox. Simple.

Also, if I click on the big “X” at the top right, that means that I want to exit the program.

Why keep the program running in the background? Nonsense!

If I want to minimize it, then I would click the “■” at the top right. Don't complicate things!

Here is what I want a music player to do:

1. Play music from my Playlist or from a CD disc or, perhaps, from a website.
2. Rip a CD disc to my computer and automatically download info off the web.
3. Burn a CD with music from my Hard Drive.
4. Copy a CD.

Make the four options listed above simple. Perhaps the easiest way to do this might be by using tabs.

At the very top, keep the usual menu items: File, Edit, Tools, Help, etc...

Then, the tabs:

My Playlist	(up to you)	Copy CD	Rip CD	Burn CD
(Use this area to display the songs' title, performer, author, length, whatever... depending on the tab selected)

Kiss it!

Keep It Simple, Sam.

Am I dreaming too much?
