This makes no sense to me.
They seemed slower than what a manual tester would do.
I think this approach is incorrect.
Using the same technique, we were not able to reproduce the bug with Firefox.
At first I thought the bug was with Watir.
In my view, there is no need to schedule it with the product owner.
And these were the cases where the tests were failing.
In investigating these issues, I noticed that the attach command was missing.
We created toolbar links for the URLs in our test and then clicked them in succession.
Features agent profiles and marketing plan plus tours of area neighborhoods, golf communities, and custom homes.
Jason Darling suggests T-shirts sales.
Client-Side Caching Scott Bellware helped us track down the problem to IE.
Different people on the team may have different interpretations of the acceptance criteria.
The question for me was what mechanism to use to trigger this option.
With user choices, I can add the behavior as an option, set up my own option file to set it up as a default for me, and then tell them about it.
But synchronizing the test suite and providing a means to mark individual tests as specific to IE or Firefox is really the only way to ensure that the two versions stay in sync.
We don't have many contributors, all of us mostly work on Watir on our own time.

If the story isn't already written up in the backlog, then write up the story.
This really depends on the specific option.
We changed the cache settings of IE, but this had no effect.
Las Vegas Real Estate, Henderson, Summerlin, Green Valley, Las Vegas.
As a result our application doesn't allow rich text, but it also doesn't preserve line breaks.
The bug is an indication that the acceptance criteria for the story really weren't

't met.

FireWatir connects to this interface using a socket.

Figuring out how to do this is not trivial.

With time, they may also choose to use it, and if so, I may make it the default.

If we were fast enough, we could reproduce the same failure.

One reason is because I am often thinking of ways that I want to change the default behavior of our test harness.

Looking forward, I think it will be a long term project to integrate Watir and FireWatir.

This can generate negative energy that actually decreases achievement.

But recently, I wanted to run them against a server that I had already started up.

I suspect that other Watir users are also seeing this bug, so I am providing some details.

Specializing in planned community properties.

Indeed, in a couple of weeks, I am co-hosting the Alt.

The group meets monthly, in the afternoon at a bookstore coffeeshop.

The problem was that we only had a simple implementation of text fields at the moment.

In fact, we review our bugs with the team every day so that we have a group understanding.

Listings and services for buyers and sellers in the local area.

There is a flaw in a story that was completed.

Merging the code bases would accomplish this as a side effect.

Indeed, Jim says that FireWatir is faster than Watir for him.

There are actually two kinds of bugs.

Once installed, you can actually telnet into Firefox and execute javascript commands.

I don't know whether the problem lies in FireWatir itself or in the JSSH plugin.

But it also reminds me of the value of feedback, and now gives me and everyone else in the meeting a new tool for learning what others find valuable.

FireWatir requires a Firefox plugin called the Javascript Shell or JSSH.

My tests would run very slowly, especially when typing.

Las Vegas Real Estate, Henderson Real Estate, Summerlin HomesOffers homes and condos for sale in the local area.

This seems to me to be the greatest long-term risk as regards FireWatir.

Some are just defects.

rb on a Windows virtual server will allow us to automatically run our tests on both IE and Firefox whenever code changes are made.

This makes no sense to me.

We don't have many contributors, all of us mostly work on Watir on our own time.

I'd appreciate your thoughts on this.

The bug represents an incomplete application and the fact that there are still more stories to be done.

But this can now be a team decision that can be made when the team has had a chance to try it both ways and decide what each of them likes better.

I eventually found a workaround for my speed problem, but it remains an issue of concern for me.

Listings and services for buyers and sellers in the local area.

In working with FireWatir this week, I spent a lot of time struggling with a speed issue.

Indeed, in a couple of weeks, I am co-hosting the Alt.

However it does require that the plug in be installed first.

At AWTA this year, I closed the meeting with set a commitments.

In my view, the right thing to do is to attach it to the un-started story.

Clearly the right way to support this going forward would be to share the classes that can be the same, and refactor the code to maximize the use of shared classes.

These makes it easy to configure options and allow them to be set from any of these sources.

Very few changes should be needed to allow the tests to run against either Watir::IE or FireWatir.

In my view, the right thing to do is to attach it to the un-started story.

This is a harder question, for a number of reasons that I will try to explain.

I only made a few small changes in a couple of places.

Net to Ruby on Rails.

I'd appreciate your thoughts on this.

They have already closed off the accounting for the story, and therefore need a new story to track their time against.

The team already committed to complete the story and already estimated the work required.

I was surprised at what I heard.
